US troops for their part, greeted the new school year in their own way, raiding more than 15 elementary schools in Baghdad. The director of one of the primary schools told the correspondent that the Americans stormed into the schools located in the Sunni areas where the Resistance is particularly active. He said that US troops brought with them presents and stationery made in the USA and "Israel."

The school director, who asked to remain anonymous, said that US officers who were with the force went among the ranks of the students in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd grades giving them gifts and asking each one of them their names and what their father and brothers, if any, did for a living. The school director said that the American officer would ask the students, "which one of you likes the Mujahideen?" and "who has a father, brother, or uncle who is a Mujahid, so that we can make him an example for his class?"

The director said that one of the teachers objected to the questioning and told the children, "Don't any one answer those questions!" The Americans then took the teacher to the schoolyard where they beat him unconscious. In a dispatch posted at 11:20am Makkah time Thursday morning, Mafkarat al-Islam reported that a British military spokesman announced in al-Basrah that British troops would be carrying out an operation to reassert "security" over the city.

The correspondent for Mafkarat al-Islam reported Tony Dunlop, a British officer, disclosed that the operation was being carried out by British troops together with their Iraqi puppet army allies under the code name "as-Sindibad" and that its aim was to, as he put it, "construct the city and return to the natural state of security." Dunlop said that 1,000 British troops and 2,000 Iraqi puppet soldiers were carrying out the operation, adding that they were pursuing Shi'i militias – whom he called "terrorists." Those pro-Iranian militias had been controlling "security" in the city since the start of the year.

Iraqi puppet officials and also western occupation officials have made frequent references to violations of "security" by the puppet police in al-Basrah, a force dominated by the Shi'i sectarian militias that support the occupation as a step towards expanding Shi'i sectarian rule and Iranian domination over southern and eastern Iraq. Operation "as-Sindibad" follows numerous smaller British operations in which commanders of the Shi'i sectarian Jaysh al-Mahdi militia were arrested and large quantities of arms and ammunition supplied to them by Iran were confiscated.
