Four Israelis were killed on Wednesday in a plane crash some 60 kilometers north of Atlantic City in New Jersey, it was revealed on Thursday.

The four - Ronald and Rachel Ziv, and David and Keren Nimrod - were flying in a single-engine Piper plane, when it apparently exploded in mid-air.

The plane then crashed in a wooded area, where the bodies of all four passengers were found strapped to their seats.

A witness said that she heard a large explosion in the air, followed shortly after by pieces of the plane falling from the sky. The debris reportedly fell on homes and a local highway in the town of Stafford.

The Foreign Ministry, together with the local Israeli consulate were investigating the reports.

Rachel Ziv's family contacted the consulate on Thursday evening to arrange for the return of their loved one's body to be buried in Israel, Army Radio reported.

The date and location of the funerals were not yet revealed.

The minority Jewish population in Palestine started to show interest in aviation in the mid 1930s. Initially, a few aero clubs were founded for glider training - the Carmel Club, the Flying Camel Club and the Aero Club of Palestine. The next step was obviously to train pilots on single-engine light planes. This activity commenced at the Palestine Flying Service, which operated three Taylorcraft light planes. The first 11 graduates received their private pilot licenses in April 1939. A second flying school was run at the same time by the Aviron ("Airplane") company, operating a Tiger Moth biplane and three Polish-made RWD-8 biplanes. First graduates of the Aviron flying school received their licenses in July 1939. Aviron grew bigger with the years, merged with Palestine Flying Service and acquired more aircraft. By January 1942, already 95 private pilot's licenses were obtained in Palestine. Aviron also assisted the Jewish underground military organization ("Haganah") in defense operations.
