

Guardian Unlimited Special reports

Home	UK	Business	Audio	World dispatch	The Wrap	Newsblog	Talk	Search
The Guardian	World	News guide	Arts	Special reports	Columnists	Technology	Help	Quiz

$20bn gas project seized by Russia

Cartoon: Kipper Williams's take
Check the latest share price

Terry Macalister, Tom Parfitt in Moscow
Tuesday December 12, 2006
The Guardian

Search this site

Go to...

- Special report: Russia
- Russia archived articles

In this section

- Trail of poison from key Litvinenko witness lands four in hospital
- \$20bn gas project seized by Russia
- For months, Kremlin piled on the pressure until Shell could take no more
- German inquiry throws up new twist in Litvinenko murder case
- Russian oil: a slippery substance
- Russia to blame, says Litvinenko widow
- Spy's assassins may have poisoned themselves - FBI
- They played together as children - and met victim at London hotel
- Puzzled? A brief guide to the polonium saga
- Profile: Andrei Lugovoi

Shell is being forced by the Russian government to hand over its controlling stake in the world's biggest liquefied gas project, provoking fresh fears about the Kremlin's willingness to use the country's growing strength in natural resources as a political weapon.

Pipeline workers on Sakhalin island. Photograph: AFP/Getty Images

After months of relentless pressure from Moscow, the Anglo-Dutch company has to cut its stake in the $20bn Sakhalin-2 scheme in the far east of Russia in favour of the state-owned energy group Gazprom.

The Russian authorities are also threatening BP over alleged environmental violations on a Siberian field in what is seen as a wider attempt to seize back assets handed over to foreign companies when energy prices were low.

The moves will alarm many investors in the City of London as Shell and other share prices are hit, but the news will also increase ministers' concerns about Britain's energy security.

Russia is becoming a key source of natural gas to the UK and Gazprom has already made clear it would like to buy a company such as Centrica, which owns British Gas. One third of western Europe's natural gas is supplied by Russia - a figure expected to rise over the next decade. The security of energy supply is now the main political issue between the EU and the Kremlin. Nervousness about the Russians was heightened last winter when the gas supply to Ukraine was cut off in the middle of a political dispute.

Shell confirmed last night that its chief executive, Jeroen van der Veer, met Gazprom's chairman, Alexei Miller, in Moscow last Friday but would say only that the talks on Sakhalin-2 were "constructive". The Russian company said that "Shell did

Hotel bar staff poisoned with polonium-210

Confusion envelops Litvinenko even as he goes to the grave

Third Litvinenko contact reportedly poisoned

Litvinenko's death was murder, says Yard

Litvinenko buried as investigations widen

indeed make several proposals concerning Sakhalin-2" at the meeting which came after Shell was threatened with having its operating licence withdrawn.

The energy minister, Viktor Khristenko, is expected to give details today of a deal under which Shell and its Japanese partners are likely to get a cash payment in return for giving Gazprom a stake in the project.

Dmitry Peskov, the official spokesman of Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, hit out yesterday at critics in the western media who implicated the Russian government in manipulating oil projects and the poisoning of dissidents. He said there was too much "anti-Russian hysteria". With reference to BP's oil spills in Alaska, he added: "If it's an environmental problem in Alaska it's environmental. If it's in Russia you call it politics."

But other senior politicians in Moscow had no doubt Shell was being harassed into reducing its 55% stake in Sakhalin-2 to something close to 25% through relentless pressure from ministries.

"In the current situation Shell will not be able to defend its economic interests in a civilised process with the Russian authorities, so they will be obliged to give up control if they want to save at least some adequate part of the project," said Vladimir Milov, Russia's former deputy energy minister.

Bob Amsterdam, the lawyer of the jailed oil oligarch Mikhail Khodorkovsky, said the Kremlin was "once again" using legal pretexts to cover what was essentially an expropriation of private resources in the energy sector. "The Kremlin ought to cease this behaviour," he said.

The Sakhalin-2 project is scheduled to start operations in 2008 and involves finding and producing oil and gas near Sakhalin island, formerly known only as a penal colony during the tsarist and Soviet eras.

The two fields that make up Sakhalin-2 have an estimated 1.2bn barrels of oil and 500bn cubic metres of natural gas. The gas is to be brought ashore, liquefied and frozen before being shipped to customers in Japan and elsewhere.

The scheme created almost immediate controversy with western conservation groups because it involves putting equipment close to breeding grounds of endangered western grey whales. There has also been criticism that sensitive salmon fishing areas are being hit by dumping of dredging spoil waste amid worries about oil spills from platforms in the Okhotsk and Japanese seas.

But even non-governmental organisations have expressed surprise at the way the Russian authorities have taken up environmental issues since the summer after taking little interest before.

Mr Peskov said it was a coincidence of timing and that it was "a process that is natural for every country" to come to eventually. Mr Putin's spokesman said Russia wanted to encourage western investment and wanted closer links with west European countries to foster mutual "interdependence".

Special reports

Russia

Oil and petrol

Ukraine

Interactive guide

Europe's dependence on Russian gas

Q&A

03.01.2006: The Russia/Ukraine gas crisis

Advertiser links

Quality UK Hypnosis CDs for Your Health

Hear MP3 audio samples of these state-of-the-art hypnosis...

hypnosisaudio.com

Vitamin UK a Top Health Store

Vitamin UK, one of the premier health stores for vitamins,...

vitaminuk.com

Independent Advice - Health Plans

Free quotes on range of healthcare insurance plans from...

medibroker.co.uk

digital tv | mortgage | diet | buy car new | it training

Printable version | Send it to a friend | Save story

Privacy policy | Terms & conditions | Advertising guide | A-Z index | About this site