The reason for all the recent pipe bombs is that Chertoff is trying to get a funding bill passed for IED's.

Chertoff Warns IEDs a Rising Threat in U.S.

The Department of Homeland Security and the FBI agree that the homemade explosive devices that have wreaked havoc in Iraq pose a rising threat to the United States. But lawmakers and first responders say the Bush administration has been slow to devise a strategy for countering the weapons and has not provided adequate money and training for a concerted national effort.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who told the Senate last month that such bombs are terrorists' "weapon of choice," said yesterday at a local meeting that President Bush will soon issue a blueprint for countering the threat of improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. Chertoff's department said in a draft report on IEDs earlier this year that national efforts "lack strategic guidance, are sometimes insufficiently coordinated . . . and lack essential resources."

Sen. Collins seeks funds for local bomb squads
By Rebekah Metzler

WASHINGTON - U.S. Sen. Susan Collins and Maine law enforcement officials braved an acorn storm Thursday morning to discuss legislation that would help local police around the country better understand bombs and improvised explosive devices, also called IEDs.

Collins, standing outside her Senate office building as acorns dropped from oak trees at a steady rate, was joined by Bangor Police Chief Ron Gastia and Maine State Police Chief Col. Patrick Fleming at a press conference to promote the National Bombing Prevention Act of 2007.

The bill's main goal, Collins said, would be to increase funds for the Office of Bombing Prevention, which is part of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security. The office would receive $10 million in 2008 and $25 million annually for 2009 and 2010 under the new bill. Its current budget is $7 million, according to Collins.

The funds would be expected to help the office maintain and update a database called TRIPwire, which is supposed to provide military information about terrorist bombing tactics and procedures to local law enforcement agencies around the country.
