According to our sources at Ron Paul Nation, a popular online social news networking site has banned this site's official Digg account. With no warnings or stated reasons, DIGG arbitrarily banned the account from posting any new articles. Apparently after posting a record amount of Positive Ron Paul mainstream media news coverage and digging each relevant and news worthy post, this pro-Ron Paul site has been cut off from sharing our positive news with the rest of the Digg culture.

This development should, but sadly doesn't, come as a surprise. Upon reading more into the Digg culture there are a definite large surge of positive Ron Paul diggers, but more recently there has been a large surge of activity from members of the "Bury Brigade," as they are known (see a few anecdotal refs here, here and here) for their efforts to bury all Ron Paul related stories bearing a positive spin.

Is it possible that since individuals, possibly even Digg staffers, actively seek to bury Paul related articles with positive diggs in excess of 3000 in addition to systematic organizational measures like banning accounts, blocking personal home IP address's and even un-digging ALL content from Ron Paul positive news sites, that the organization is not only engaged in censorship of content, but also in a biased attack on pro-Paul sites offering relevant content and breaking news about the Congressman from Texas? After all, it is clear that Paul enjoys unprecedented amounts of grassroots support, unparalleled by any other Presidential candidate, and has even broken the Republican Party's record for single-day donations.

Certainly 4.2 million dollars from a reported 38,400 donations all within a 24 hour period is nothing to scoff at.

On second thought, maybe that is the problem.
