ISRAELI EMBASSY IN NYC A RADIATION HOT SPOT
 by x Saturday, Oct. 14, 2006 at 5:05 PM

Feds surveyed NYC for radiation, found tainted park, Embassy

WASHINGTON -- Anti-terrorism officials conducted a helicopter survey of New York City's radiation sources in preparation for a so-called "dirty bomb" attack - and discovered a Staten Island park with dangerously high levels of radium, a new report found.

Federal authorities found 80 unexpected "hot spots" around New York City, according to the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress.

The GAO report released Thursday details a previously undisclosed aerial anti-terrorism program in New York City, one which may be extended to other cities worried about the possible release of radioactive material by terrorists.

The report does not identify which city park had the contaminated soil, but NYPD officials said it was in Gateway National Park in Staten Island. The site was closed, and New York has requested federal money to do a citywide aerial survey every year to update the information.

By creating a map of the city's radiation sources, city officials hope to be able to respond more quickly in the event of a dirty bomb attack, know exactly which streets are contaminated and get civilians away.

New York is the first and only U.S. city to conduct a complete aerial radiological survey, having paid the U.S. Department of Energy $800,000 for the 2005 study.

The helicopters picked up sources of low-level radiation from expected places, like granite statues and medical isotopes at hospitals, but it also found dozens of other sources of unexpected radioactivity, the GAO report found.

"NYPD officials indicated that the survey was tremendously valuable because it identified more than 80 locations with radiological sources that required further investigation to determine their risk," the report said.

At the Staten Island park, sensors detected large quantities of radium in the soil. Long-term exposure to radium increases the risk of developing lymphoma, bone cancer and leukemia.

National Park Service spokesman Brian Feeney said the area is a one-acre piece of the 570-acre Great Kills Park, which is part of the larger Gateway park.

Feeney said experts assured them after the August 2005 study that the area posed no public health risk, and said visitors do not go into that area anyway because of dense vegetation. He did not know if any warnings had been placed around the site.

The radiation apparently comes from "some piece of industrial equipment, pieces of old rusty metal. Whatever this equipment used to do, it picked up radioactivity," he said.

"We keep people out of that area. It's a non-accessible area of the park, no one can get in there," said Feeney. "There's no health hazard now, there was never a health hazard to the public."

He said the agency has applied to the Department of Energy for funding to further survey the site.

Staten Island's congressman, Rep. Vito Fossella, said the contamination was a surprise to him and residents near the park, and he demanded more information.

"It is essential for the government to act immediately to fully understand the extent of the contamination," said Fossella, who was trying to arrange a meeting Friday with federal and city officials to discuss further testing and possible removal of the contaminated soil.

One alleged radiation hot spot on Manhattan's east side has the potential for becoming a political hot spot: A strong radiation spike from the area of the Israeli Embassy. Officials would not comment on why they thought that particular area allegedly showed such a stunning peak in radiation.

The aerial survey is designed to help local officials react more quickly in the event of terrorists detonating a "dirty bomb" that releases radioactive material into the air. With the survey, police may be able to pinpoint the exact source of radiation by comparing new readings to their pre-existing "radiation map" of the area.

NYPD spokesman Paul Browne said the department wanted a record of the city's naturally occurring and other "radiological signatures" to compare with periodic readings it does to detect for dirty bombs or other nuclear devices.

"It gives us a baseline so we can pick up any anomalies," he said.

New York City is the only major city to conduct a full-scale Aerial Background Radiation Survey to identify "hot spots," though such work has been done in the nation's capitol, according to the report.

The GAO found neither the Department of Energy nor the Department of Homeland Security believe they are required to conduct such radiation mapping, though the investigators said there were "significant benefits" to surveys in other urban areas.

Homeland Security officials agreed that they should study the cost and effectiveness of expanded radiation mapping in additional cities.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., called the report further proof the federal government is not doing enough to help cities guard against terrorism.

The hot spot mapping initiative "should also be shared with cities across the country, not mothballed because the Homeland Security Department doesn't want to put up the money," Schumer said.

The GAO report also found the Department of Energy may need to beef up security at Nellis Air Force Base in Nevada and Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland because those sites hold key national assets for responding to a radiological or nuclear attack.

Specialized quick-response teams and equipment are concentrated at those two sites, and a successful attack against either could leave one section of the country with limited capacity to respond to a subsequent strike with radioactive weapons, the GAO said.

The agency's associate administrator, Michael C. Kane, was adamant the sites are safe.

"We categorically reject the contention that physical security at two of our facilities may not be sufficient for protecting against terrorist attacks," Kane wrote.>>

Just a thought but the US government knows about it and is using Israel as the middle man to stage a nuclear false flag attack on NYC and blame on Iran. Just a thought.

Especially if that report came from Indymedia.org that is known to have heavy bias against Israel? Doesn't surprise me. The writer of the article could have insert the paragraph with the allegation about Israel, as I was reading the whole article, the flow of it seem went off with the paragraph about Israel and alleged radiation spikes inserted. There was no follow-up to that paragraph, as you would have notice that.

As a rule in journalism writing, when a writer insert a paragraph with sensational claims or allegations, there is to be a follow-up paragraph countering or supporting the preceding paragraph with sources confirming it or not.

There were no sources confirming that paragraph (in red) in the follow-up paragraphs. That's why the flow of the article went off with that paragraph in red.

In my opinion, the CIA, Mossad and MI6 work together all of the time. IF there is something being hidden in the Israeli Embassy then our government definately knows about it and condones it. I don't buy into all of the hate the jews posts being conducted on GLP lately but there is some credence that Mossad had a support role in 9/11. Look at all of Israeli employees that didn't show up for work at the WTC that morning, Odigo employees getting advanced warning and all of the cheering Israeli agents found. It wasn't Israel by themselves though... the US, Britain and Israel are all one big crime collective. Or at least that's the way I see it.

BREAKING.....

The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, issued a report Thursday stating that a survey found 80 "hot spots" with radiation in the city, including "a local park" that was "contaminated by large quantities of radium." 'MINUSCULE' AMOUNT

Walter Mugdan, the EPA's director of environmental planning and protection for the region that includes New York, said it was more like a "minuscule amount."

He added that after the aerial survey found the contaminated spot, an ensuing ground survey identified about 10 more spots within 150 feet.

The area initially flagged by the inspection, amounting to a 1-foot-square patch of dirt, emitted about one millirem of radioactivity per hour.

"You'd have to stand on that exact spot for nine hrcs and you'd get the same dose of radiation as from a dental X-ray," Mugdan said.

The other spots, he added, are even weaker.

The radiation at Great Kills was detected on Aug. 2, 2005, in a quarter-acre area between the Great Kills Ranger station and the model airplane field. Brian Sullivan, general superintendent for the Park Service, said a slew of agencies was on site the next day.

Sullivan said that, while the EPA determined there was no health risk, it followed through on a recommendation to fence off the area and let vegetation grow to restrict access. The area included a path used for fire mitigation, but wasn't frequently used.

He said the Park Service is in the process of seeking $250,000 to further study the area and determine whether other steps, such as remediation, need to be taken. USED AS PAINT

Radium had a variety of uses in the early 20th century, Mugdan said, including glow-in-the-dark paint for wristwatch faces and road signs. Eventually it was found to be poisonous and its use was discontinued.

Based upon rusted metal flakes extracted from the soil, the source could have been "some little piece of equipment used for radium processing or management or handling," Mugdan said.

It likely dates to the 1940s, when the area was marshes and wetlands, and the city decided to turn it into a park. The material was likely present in landfill used to build up low-lying areas, which was then capped with soil.

Fossella said the fill could have further contamination. He added that public alarm could have been avoided "if, when discovered, every responsible agency came forward and said what we're saying now."

When asked why the report was withheld from the public, Homeland Security released a statement explaining the intent of the aerial surveys. Calls seeking to clarify the department's role in the suppression of the information were not returned.

The NYPD, meanwhile, will not release the reports, in order to "discourage attempts at targeting them for theft, and to discourage any attempt to disguise the warehousing of illegally obtained radioactive material by storing it in close proximity to one or more of these facilities."

In my opinion, the CIA, Mossad and MI6 work together all of the time. IF there is something being hidden in the Israeli Embassy then our government definately knows about it and condones it. I don't buy into all of the hate the jews posts being conducted on GLP lately but there is some credence that Mossad had a support role in 9/11. Look at all of Israeli employees that didn't show up for work at the WTC that morning, Odigo employees getting advanced warning and all of the cheering Israeli agents found. It wasn't Israel by themselves though... the US, Britain and Israel are all one big crime collective. Or at least that's the way I see it.

"Jews" control the federal reserve here and across the world.

That should be all anyone needs to know.

They're either confronted now or never.

I think it actually makes it a better pin that this had been known about for six months, and buried in the media and by the government. That makes the points being made in this thread that much more concerning.
