Ron Paul to be added to presidential ballot in Louisiana?

Apparently motivated by the actions of the Louisiana State GOP during the Louisiana Caucus, a group of activists in Louisiana, including members of a group known as the LSU Constitutionalists, have banded together to nominate Ron Paul to the presidential ballot in the state. The move requires the support of 9 electors and a $500 filing fee, which the group has purportedly organized, and will be moving forward with the action before the state deadline later this week. The paperwork to be submitted is legal and does not require Dr. Paul's signature or permission. According to reports, Dr. Paul is aware of the effort, but neither supports or discourages the move.

In January, Ron Paul had the greatest number of pledged Louisiana delegates who had registered by the original January 10 deadline. When that fact became apparent, the state GOP extended the registration deadline for delegates to January 12, and disqualified a number of Louisiana voters using an outdated voter registration list. The action infuriated Paul supporters across the state, who claim the party's actions paved the way for John McCain to narrowly win a majority of the state's delegates.

If successful, Louisiana could be the only state in the nation with Paul on the ballot. The potential ramifications of such a move could be huge, with the possibility of drawing enough of the state's conservative voters away from John McCain to allow for an Obama victory in the state in the general election.

The nominee for the Republican party will be decided here. The primary presidential vote means nothing according to the rules of the Republican party. They only have pledged delegates, and once the delegates get to the convention, they can change their mind. Ron Paul is a Representative, and also has zero executive experience as does Sen. Obama. This is the NEEDED Change for this Country

GOOD, if not me, then Ron Paul, he is better than all the current candidates put together.
