American States Declaring Sovereignty

By: Blitzkrieg- on: 08.02.2009 [16:02 ] (143 reads)

I skimmed through the New Hampshire session, and it mentioned that in the event of martial law and other circumstances that the constitution is considered null.

Frankly I'm surprised that there has been no other mention of this elsewhere, but here are the links for anyone wishing to browse through them for themselves. I haven't looked through any others at the moment because I'm a bit busy but I wanted to send this information right away because if true it's big news.

9+ States have now declared sovereignty, now add Washington to the list.

Arizona State Legislature for formulating a bill that declares their state sovereignty. That same bill further details their right during martial law to call back servicemen to protect the state:

"...if the President or any other federal entity attempts to institute martial law or its equivalent without an official declaration in one or more of the states without the consent of that state ... individual members of the military return to their respective states and report to the Governor until a new President is elected..."

In case you didn't hear about it on the mainstream media (which you haven't because they want to keep us asleep), numerous states are currently declaring or have already declared sovereignty, including:
